About NIDAC

Alcohol and drug use among Indigenous Australians has been shaped by history. With the effects of dispossession, alienation, trauma and loss recognized as contributing factors to the health and well being that Indigenous Australians continue to experience today, the use of tobacco, alcohol, kava, volatile substances and other drugs have consequently become the cause and effect of much suffering in Indigenous communities.

The National Indigenous Drug and Alcohol Committee (NIDAC) was specifically set up by the Australian National Council on Drugs to provide advice to the Government on these matters.

NIDAC gains valuable feedback through consultation with Indigenous communities, experts and those working to address Indigenous drug and alcohol issues.

NIDAC's vision is to reduce the alcohol and drug problems and associated harms in Indigenous communities nationally and is committed to providing high level advice to Government on ways of addressing the serious issues that exist for Indigenous Australians.
